Enduring Love.

Ka'e Bossisa backer's daughter. When a girl she betrothed herself to a young man whom she laved death. She west home from boardieg school with her heart pledged to her lover; but she seen found that her father was of a d ff rent mind. A. F. B as hed grown enormously in woulth, while the young man's lather, a coutric or, had been unfortugate. Mr. Boss forbide her to constension the suit of a pour man's son and she was obedient, though she was revengefully repellant to other suitors. She spent her winters here in Reading at her home, and her summers at her father's country house at Wormelsdorf, twenty miles distant.

The young heiress became almost a recluse, ut she did not let anybody know the reason. In everything clan her father give her the utmost freedom; but in the matter of a busbend be not only decied her the man of her liking, but fically chose one for her. This was Dector Beaver, who lived close by the Boas residence at Wormeldorf, and belonged to a wealthy fami lg. Kate matried Dr. Bazver. He was in all respects worthy of her. There was a grand wedding, and an ex ended bridal tour. The husband was steepsstul in his profession, the wife became a leader in fashionble society, and a daughter was born.

Dr. Beaver excitedly entered the office of the prosecuting attorney of this empty, William M. Goodman, one day, and asked for help to expose and punish a faithlets wift. He believed that Kye had a lover other than himself, and wanted the means of learning the truth. Da tectives were placed at lis service, and it was not long before he was prepared to plainly soen e his wife. He hid a witness in his office, and then sent for her. She came without knowing what she was to hear, and the blunt accusation of having held clandestine meetings with her lover was like a blow in the face,
"Whoever says that lies," she indignant'y

Did you never w.ite to him?" he asked.

"Never since I left school." "Have you not written to him within three or four werks?

"No. Then he put before her the proof of her alsity -a letter which she had sent by a housemaid to the lover, but which the detectives bad intercepted. In it the said, "Who could imagine that such a drama was being enacted here in real life?' The dector said that they would have to separate. She wept, and begged of him not to drive her out.

"Let me remaie as your housekeeper," she nied, "if not as your wife."

Her prayer for lorgiveness was in vain. Her us and cavertly ascertained that the witness had heard all she had said, and then dismissed her. He permitted her to stay in the bouse, but on longer as his wife. She would not go to her father for comfort, for he already had. through fai'ure in business, as much trouble as he could bear, and she dared not see or send to her lover. She was informed that her husband had begun proceedings for divores. She made on defense, and said that she would confess to her father. The aged and broken down man went to her, responsive to a message, and heard from her own lips how wretchedly the wedlick of his placning had turned out.

The testimony giving before the referee, Simon P. O'Reil v. was son vincing enough; but it hardly dograded the case to the level of ordinary divorce proceedings. However, the professional spies swore that Kate and her lover met frequently; but her own servants described his visit to the house in her husband's absence. A rear gate has been fixed so that he could open it from the outside, ortain signals had been agreed on to indicate danger and safety, notes had been sent to and fro frequently, and he had all but lived in the bouse while the doctor was away on a fishing excursion.

One witness described the wife as slipping out from the presence of her husband in the parler, lifting her silk train as the tripped over the dew of the garden grass, and meeting her lover for a sentimental exchange of words in the shadow of a back feace. Enother told of her jeslousy on hearing a rumor that he was paying court to a girl, and it seems that it was her dread of his marrying anybody else, rather than any purpose or idea of being untrue to her own vows, that made her clirg to him. She always spoke most respectfully of her husband and praised sim for his kindness and generosity.

She once told the story of her school day romance to a friend as an occurrence lorg past, but added, impulsively, "I love him to this dey."

A passege in one of her letters to him, however, indicates that she had rejected a proposal to clope "May God bless and reward you for your devotion," she wrote, "for I never can," and the last four words were underscored. The law uit, ending yesterday in Dr. Beaver securing the divorce, made the matter known to everybody. Kate kept herself out of sight, as though crushed by shame. But she could not hide from herself, and, to desden her feeling, she took to drugging herself with opium. Her reason was soon destroyed and she was taken to
